Q: Powerful Displays for Dummies I am very new to displays, and even more new to compositing. I am quite familiar with OpenGL and my graphics knowledge is sufficient enough to carry out simple operations in GLSL. The problem is that I can not find a good source for a good tutorial or book that teaches me how to create and use powerful displays with complex features. The books I find are either overly-complicated or for experienced users that are not really written for beginners. I don't know if I am really going about this the right way, but do I really have to learn GLSL or will an application written in C using Xlib or another library of DLLs suffice?

A: Books are great, but a lot of times they're only a fair foundation to building your skills. You can learn all of the basics of OpenGL in a couple hours, but the powerful features you might want to take advantage of come with much more work. Free resources are great to learn a few things, but unless you have the spare time to do it over and over again, these won't really help you. Look into the tutorials on the various packages, like GLUT, GLX, SDL2 (and SDL 2.0, which is a SDL2 port for Linux/OpenGL/X11). Free software is free for the most part, so it doesn't matter which one you use. From there you can move to a paid program, such as Blender, to speed up your learning.
