BookwormÂ .On the one hand, perhaps a Mr. Obama's fingers are being too tightly crossed. On the other hand, President Obama has already articulated a new vision for American foreign policy: Apply a new emphasis on economic issues to all of the world's problems, including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In one of the highlights of his first year in office, Mr. Obama nominated Richard C. Holbrooke, a former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, to be his special representative on the Middle East. Mr. Holbrooke is experienced in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and has been in negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians for years. President Obama has recognized the importance of the economic in international affairs, and has appointed a top economist, Jeffrey D. Sachs, to be his special adviser for developing economics strategies.

And he has appointed Robert Zoellick, the former chairman of the World Bank, as his ambassador to China, where the president has met with great success with the recent endorsement of the D-U-N-S deal. Yet America's most urgent problem — the surge of refugees flowing from Iraq and Syria — has not been a focus of the president's foreign policy. The president himself said, "I don't think that we can — in fact, I've been very clear in saying we cannot — send American combat troops into Iraq and Syria." And there has been no explicit mention of the refugee crisis in the president's State of the Union address. Mr. Obama's hesitancy to focus on the refugee crisis is understandable, in part because it has not yet been a pressing issue and in part because Prime Minister Netanyahu and other Israelis have protested that American efforts in Iraq have allowed more than 2 million refugees to flee Syria. Matt D'Souza Matt D'Souza is an Indian film director, producer, actor, former DSP and former administration officer. D'Souza is known for his direction of Kannada comedy films and was amidst all the madness and muck, we didn't notice. We're not the only ones to have missed it. The underlying story from last week's The Godfather finale is being flatly denied by the entertainment press. It's been covered as a wild goose chase, a tragi-romantic mess, a misguided lark. It was all of those things, but not one of them was its own story. The TV press like to cover the big and the bold, and this was both. Frankly, they didn't really know what to make of it. These events don't happen that often. And because they didn't happen that often, they were read as just the end of a story, and it was all a mistake. The real story is that the events of the past have set a new course. And like anything, this doesn't happen without change. The ship wasn't just flung into the next open path; this is a major shift in the story. If you want to call it an ending, that's just fine. But The Godfather isn't set in stone. (Because it never was.) When Luca Brasi settles into the season's final episode, he's given an extended monologue about the changes that the events of last week's episode have brought, and how
