In order to access their network of more than 100 stores, customers must have a business or personal email address with which to register. Self-service checkouts, use of roaming customers to build accounts, or a one-way email address for a purchasing authorization. According to the complaint, a third-party third-party business offered its services to nearly 5,000 pharmacies. It's not clear if any of them accepted the service. As a result, the complaint alleges that hundreds of thousands of customers, some of whom may not be aware of the scam, may have had their information exposed, as well as their medication history. In some instances, Cardiomedical alleged that unauthorized charges were made against customers' credit cards. In response to the preliminary injunction, the FTC suspended operations of the company and froze its assets. Bank of America put Cardiomedical's charter into "safe-keeping" pending the outcome of the case, which will be decided by a federal judge. If Cardiomedical is found responsible, the company could face penalties ranging from $2,500 to $500,000, the FTC said. The FTC has previously taken legal action against a site that exposed consumers' Social 648931e174
